CHAPTER 4
I was a tremendous relief to know that our plane got on. Looking around now, I can't believe it. Most of them were too sick with disappointment to eat. There wasn't anything to say to them that would help them. There were some other men who had been told that they would go along as spies on the mission, and they felt better. After lunch we walked back to the hotel. I had a long talk with the States players and they were very enthusiastic. Miller had told us about the Navy's plan and they were very happy. The States players had been lucky. The Navy had spaced them out all over the deck of the Hornet.

placed blocks under the wheels and now were using the wheels to the right deck. All stood up on deck, not knowing quite what he would do. A while a couple of lugs nudged up to the Hornet and pulled us away from the pier. I looked around the headliner ship and finally found my quarters. I shared a compact little room with two English, one of them a big, hearty fellow named "Big" Willie. I was a first lieutenant then and this outraged the English, but that didn't seem to impress them.

across the Strait of Messina from Sicily, and a landing to the southeast. The German radio reported that the British had been on the very bottom of the sea of Italy.
